The culture and preparation of tea

Tea is generally grown from seed. In Formosa, however, for many years much of the propagation has been by layering. In this way a lateral branch of a chosen bush is scraped of its bark for an inch or so, and this portion is pegged into the ground and allowed to root. In Japan, for many years, both layers and single-leaf cuttings have been used to some extent. Although in Japan, Indonesia, India and Ceylon, seed is still the usual method of planting, intensive study of vegetative propagation is under way in all four countries. A selected bush may give 25 to 50 per cent more yield than the average, or produce tea with markedly better quality and strength, and these characteristics are absolutely repeated in the bush grown from a cutting and treated in a similar manner to the parent. Propagation by cuttings of selected clones or by seed taken from generative clones, is bound to become standard procedure in come form or other in due course.
